Are you an ambitious scholar with strong commitment to high-quality research in the strategy domain? Are you passionate about teaching and delivering an exceptional student experience in a Russell Group University? Do you have experience in applying for research funding?

We are seeking to appoint a high-calibre individual at the Lecturer (Assistant Professor) level in the S&O subject group within the Management Department of Leeds University Business School (LUBS). The school is internationally renowned for the quality of its research, its teaching, and its facilities. REF 2021 positions LUBS as one of the UK's leading business schools for research and impact power. As a triple accredited, top-ranking European business school, it has more than 3000 students from around 100 countries and more than 200 academic staff. Its work covers the full spectrum of business disciplines, creating new knowledge and teaching undergraduate, masters, and doctoral students.

The S&O group and the affiliated Centre for Technology Innovation and Engagement \(C-TIE\) are the focal points for strategy-related research and education at LUBS. With its collegial and vibrant team of scholars, the S&O group aspires to become one of the leading faculties working at the intersections of strategic management, organisational theory, and innovation management. The S&O group, and the broader Management department it part of, is an exceptionally nurturing and rewarding place to work. For the position that has opened, we are looking for a colleague who has a promising research profile and the skills to deliver excellent teaching. While we are open to considering applications from candidates with interest in any strategy subfield, we have preference for those specializing in one of the following areas: corporate leadership and governance; corporate strategy; competitive strategy; knowledge and innovation management; strategic management of sustainable business practices and/or diversity, equity and inclusion.
